Working Creatively with Groups Online

The overall aim of the course is to help participants increase their own confidence, competence and creativity in online work.

A way of looking at online work with groups is to see it as having three dimensions: Hands (doing), Heart (relating), and Head (thinking).

- ◆ The Hands Dimension: here the focus is on how we do things. It is about techniques, methods, tools, processes and the technical issues to be managed.
- ◆ The Heart Dimension: here the focus is on feelings. It is about the feelings experienced working with a group online, and how relationships, a sense of inclusion and engagement are managed.
- ◆ The Head Dimension: here the focus is how we think about the work. It is about clarifying purpose and intention, analysing situations, using apt frameworks and ideas, developing insights, reflecting on technology.

All three dimensions will be attended to on the course.

The course is structured to help participants both experience and design engaging and participative processes that enhance creativity. It will value and build on participants' knowledge and experience. It will have a practical focus using real life examples from participants' and the facilitators' experience of online work done and online work being planned for. The thinking and tasks needed to be done "behind the scenes" to ensure productive work with groups will be highlighted.

The course will happen on Zoom, and will show how to get the most out of this platform in collaboration with other online tools.

The course is open to all. It will be of particular interest to those who have participated in Partners Creative Facilitation courses.

The course will be facilitated by Frank Naughton and Jacqui Gage
